Parks Canada and partners take first step toward creating a national urban park in St. John's!

On July 8th, 2024, members of our team at CPAWS NL were invited to attend an announcement regarding the creation of a National Urban Park in the St. John's area. While this project is still in its infancy, there is plenty to get excited about!

Nearly three-quarters of all Canadians live in urban centres, which can make getting out in the wilderness difficult. Parks and natural areas in cities are good for both human and environmental health, and can help combat biodiversity loss. Many city green spaces, however, are threatened by development and pollution, particularly in areas where people experience a higher degree of marginalization.

The first and so far only National Urban Park opened in 2015 on the Rouge River in the Greater Toronto Area. Projects are currently underway in other cities across Canada, now including St. John's!

We don't yet have any idea where the National Urban Park might be located, but in the meantime, this process reminds us to appreciate all the ways we can connect with nature in and around the capital city!
